The First Italian Flag in Venice.

LETTER FROM AN AMERICAN PRINCE.

The following private letter from a citizen of New York, now travelling in Europe, tells of an exciting incident in which the writer bore a prominent part. He carried the first Italian flag openly into Venice which was seen there after the cession of that city to Italy:

cannot resist the temptation to tell you of our experiences more difficult than we anticipated in getting through to Venice; notwithstanding the cessation of hostilities, the old routes of travel are not entirely re-established, and the hated Austrians have not yet evacuated Venetia. After a good deal of trouble and vexation in various ways we finally reached Padua. There I found that should have to take a carriage to Mestre—a four-hour drive—and then a gondola—two hours—to Venice.

In the depth of our sympathy for poor Venetia, and our detestation of the Austrian Government, we thought the Italian flag would also be the most becoming and appropriate adornment of our equipage. Soon after coming to this conclusion, we succeeded in purchasing a handsome line flag, about four feet square, which was raised on the front of our carriage—an open barouche. A few flags were timidly displayed from private houses on the road. Ours attracted a great deal of attention and was often saluted, but not by the Austrians, who only growled at us.

As we approached Mestre I observed that the display of the Italian flag from the houses ceased entirely. When we entered Mestre I noticed people running from all directions

Our landing place, where we were to take gondola for the remainder of our journey, found ourselves surrounded by a crowd of several hundred people, in the wildest state of excitement, screaming and hurraing in the most extraordinary manner.

At first I scarcely realized what it meant. If they had been Austrians we would have been torn to pieces in about five minutes. Quickly discovered, however, that they were

At the sight of their dear flag. An old man of sixty or seventy years of age, seized the flag and waved it over the heads of the people crying "Viva l'Italia, viva l'Italia," and the crowd responded with tremendous shouts and cheers.

We then directed the flag to be fastened to the bow of our gondola, and when that was done the welkin rang again with the shouts of the crowd. By this time we had entered the canale of the beginning without interruption. I waved the old stars and stripes, and our gondolier cried out, "America saluta l'Italia," and we sailed away for the far-famed and beautiful "city of the sea," followed by the cheers and the excited throng on shore and cries of "viva l'Italia, viva l'Italia."

This, however, proved to be but a feeble episode to what followed. I had noticed with surprise the entire absence of the Italian flag from Mestre to Venice. Not one was to be seen, save the one on the bow of our little gondola. As we approached the city I looked in all directions for some indication of the flag, but not one was to be seen. Instead of that, I noticed people running from every direction.

and collecting on the wharves. Presently we heard cries similar to those which had greeted us at Mestre. When we entered the great canal—the main street of Venice—the wharves were crowded with an excited multitude, who clapped their hands and fairly rent the air with their screams and cheers. Gray-headed old men and women waved their hats and handkerchiefs and danced like children; young women wept, and everybody shouted. We did not know what to make of it, but to Accordingly. The excitement spread like wildfire. As far ahead as we could see, the wharves and bridges and windows and roofs of the houses were crowded with people. As we passed along about upon about arose from the multitude, and we were greeted on every side with bravos and vivas, and waving handkerchiefs and clapping of hands. Of course I waved the American flag to the people, and thus it was known who we were.

By some means or other we find occasion for a tremendous excitement in Venice, but I did not quite understand it. Victor Emmanuel himself could scarcely have had a more triumphant entry into Venice, and certainly no more of a enthusiastic reception at the hands of the Venetians. Now what do you suppose it meant? Simply this: The Venetians do not know that the war is ended, but the Austrian flag still floats in Venetia and the Austrian troops are with here. The Venetians of course know that Venetia is theirs, but the mass of the people do not. We were the first to carry the Italian flag into Venice, and thus impart to thousands of anxious hearts the joyful news that Venice is free from the Austrian yoke! That was glory enough for us for one day. The occasion was one that will not soon be forgotten by us nor by the sands in Venice.

Conservatory, like the Battle-Stone, always gives warning of its approach. A hacking cough, often in the chest, difficulty of breathing, are the first signs. There is then a cold, which may be cured. If it is neglected, and go on until pneumonia is set in, the patient is in a dangerous way. If the blood vessels, death will be the result.
